RESEARCH PUBLICATIONS

My research advances the boundaries of interdisciplinary engagement on international rule-of-law issues. While I originate from within the subfield of Law & Society, I extend the disciplinary frontiers of scholarship between law & social sciences by arguing for the significance of rule-of-law issues in social science treatment of international problems. In particular, I use case studies with “bottom-up” perspectives of individuals & communities in global aid agendas, with findings that drive interventions that demonstrate the prevalence of rule-of-law concerns in prevailing social science theories. In order to do this, I publish across a range of areas to show how rule-of-law problems permeate & challenge a breadth of social science perspectives on international issues. My publications have made interventions in areas of Law & Development, Human Rights, Environment, International Relations, Comparative Law, & International Law. I make unique contributions to global levels of scholarship by drawing upon my experiences as advisor to international aid programs in developing countries of Southeast Asia & as an Indigenous scholar with a multi-cultural & multi-disciplinary background sensitive to the grass-roots complexities challenging international aid agendas.

TEACHING

My teaching connects to a theme of international engagement informed by my research agenda. In keeping with my research profile, as a teacher I promote awareness of local-level complexities (particularly for marginalised communities) that challenge the implementation of laws, drawing upon my experiences in international rule-of-law development projects; my multi-national network of scholars, NGO workers, & policy practitioners; & my background as a multi-cultural & multi-disciplinary Indigenous scholar. My teaching philosophy is to nurture critical analysis skills & tolerance for diverse perspectives. I connect scholarly theory with real-world events to help students better understand the relevancy of their education to their lives.
